

Remote Work Policy

Document owner: People Operations • Last updated: 2025-11-28

Nordvane is remote-first rather than remote-friendly, and the distinction carries operational weight. There is no office anyone is expected to attend, and consequently decisions are not made in rooms. If a discussion produces a decision, that decision is written into the relevant Linear project or into a document; it is not left in a call recording, and a call recording is not treated as documentation. An employee who missed the call should be able to reconstruct what was decided and why from written material alone, and if they cannot, the decision was not properly recorded.

Hours

Core hours are 11:00 to 15:00 CET, during which employees are expected to be reachable on working days. Outside that window, schedules are individual and are nobody else's business. Meetings scheduled outside core hours require the agreement of everyone invited, and recurring meetings outside core hours are not permitted at all, because a recurring meeting that inconveniences one participant compounds into a real cost over a year. Employees in Singapore and on the North American west coast are the practical constraint here, and the core hours window was narrowed from six hours to four in 2024 for exactly that reason.

Asynchronous communication is the default. A question posted in Slack should not be expected to receive an answer within the hour, and the expectation that it will is the main way remote-first companies drift back into synchronous habits. Anything genuinely urgent goes through the on-call paging path, which exists precisely so that urgency has a channel that does not depend on someone happening to be looking at Slack. Escalating in Slack by mentioning someone repeatedly is not an urgency mechanism and does not work.

Location

Employees may work from any country in which Nordvane can legally employ or contract them, which as of January 2026 is fourteen countries. Relocation between countries requires 60 days notice to people operations, because it usually changes the employing entity, frequently changes the tax treatment, and occasionally changes the salary band. None of those are obstacles, but all of them take time, and a relocation announced with two weeks notice creates a problem that is genuinely difficult to solve after the fact.

Situation	Notice required	Approval	Notes
Working from another country, up to 30 days per year	Informal note to manager	None	Cumulative across the calendar year
Working from another country, 30 to 90 days	30 days	Manager and People Operations	May create tax exposure
Permanent relocation	60 days	People Operations	May change entity, tax, and salary band

Table 1. Notice requirements for changes of location.

Stipend and offsites

The coworking stipend is 150 euros per month, claimed through the expense tool against an invoice from the coworking provider. It may not be applied to a private office lease, and it cannot be converted into cash or into equipment for employees who prefer to work from home. Finance reviews stipend claims only for the presence of an invoice; there is no approval step.

There are two company offsites per year, typically in Tallinn in May and in a rotating location in October. Attendance is expected but is not mandatory, and people operations track attendance only to book travel. Travel and accommodation for offsites are booked centrally rather than expensed individually, which is the single exception to the travel policy's rule that employees book their own travel. Partners and children are welcome at the October offsite at the employee's own cost, an arrangement that started informally in 2023 and was made explicit after enough people asked.